Not illustrated. 1891 Excerpt: ... Augustine got no further than France on his first attempt. He returned to the pope, who, intolerant of human weakness, forced him to try again, and the event justified Gregory's severity. Augustine ventured with a small band of monks across the Channel, and became the first founder of Christianity in our country, and the first Archbishop of Canterbury. With him is Paulinus, sent from Rome by Gregory to the North of England. He accompanied the Christian Princess Ethelburga to Northumbria, hoping to convert the king, her bridegroom, and his heathen land to Christianity--a hope which was fulfilled at the time, though, as we have seen, ten years after the death of Paulinus the mission had collapsed. In Paulinus begins the recognized archiepiscopal succession to the see of York. The sculptor has evidently read Bede's description of the bishop's appearance. He is spoken of as tall with a slight stoop, black hair, a thin face, aquiline nose, an aspect at once venerable and awe-striking. It was under Paulinus's beneficent influence that the great peace reigned in the hitherto rude and barbarous realm of northern Britain, when it was said a woman and her infant might walk unharmed from sea to sea, when brazen drinking cups were placed over every spring of water on the highroads and no man durst take them away. Those days of peace lasted, however, but a short time, and were followed by a year hateful to all good men, after the kings of Wales and Mercia had devastated Northumbria and slain the good Edwin at Hatfield (633). When his friend and converts' head was brought to him at York all Paulinus's courage forsook him; he was not indeed the stuff of which martyrs are made, and he fled to the South and settled down as Bishop of Ro...
